

PACSS, the Preservation and Conservation Student Society, is a student led organization based on understanding and protecting artifacts and monuments of the past. This preservation is not limited only to architecture, but also art and history. PACSS is student focused offering many opportunities to meet likewise students through lectures, tours, presentations, and meetings. There is no fee to join PACSS so that it may be open to all students of any majors and even accepts members from other colleges and universities.

PACSS members engage in activities that include:

- Advocacy

- Community outreach

- Extracurricular scholarship

- Interdisciplinary collaboration

Students can gain experience, new friendships, and a better understanding of past architectural feats that can improve their education and quality of life while attending school.

The goal of the organization is to contribute to the College of Architecture and Texas A&M as a whole, creating a network of opportunity, understanding, and development across disciplines.
